

Gerard Way. At 37, he's an award winning writer and artist.

As a child, Way seemed to have an infatuation with comics. He loved to read, and he loved the art that came with the story. This seemingly affected his style significantly as he developed his skills.

His art is very blocky, pointed, and shadowed; a typical comic style. It catches the readers attention easily, and the bright colors add to the emotion. I always liked his art because I thought it was very emotional and conveyed his thoughts out greatly to whoever was looking.

His art from a young age covered many mediums. He even came close to his own cartoon on cartoon Network, but the show was declined because of similarities with another show at the time.

With all of this considered, I believe Way is a great example of a modern day artist. As a musician, writer, and painter, he seems to express himself with every medium he can. He is beloved by adoring fans all over the world for these things, and I think he shows greatness in whatever he does.
